Town building is much like College football, where a dozen of the students do all the playing while the others sit in the grand stand and look on, says CARL Crow in The Saturday Team Work in City Evening Post, Building.

Unfortunately the town where "all the citizens put their shoulders to the wheel of progress" is the model town that us not yet been built.

In the modern game of town building factories and railroads are the big prizes, and they can only be secured by the proper kind of team work. Until factories come the town is merely a place where the wealth created by the surrounding farmers is exchanged. Locate the Courthouse there and the trade area widens to include a few more farms, and a few officials move in.

This is the analytical card-index system of town building, developed by the new profession of commercial Secretaries. Through it the prospective investor, seeking a location for a cotton compress in a Southern town, is able to learn the one railroad station where he could best locate and compere with existing cotton compresses. Through it flour mills, electric light and gas plants, steam laundries and brick plants are located with a certainty of return on the investment never known under the old alipshod system, which was no system at all.

This plan of securing factories is more common in the West than in the East. Property owners who have seen the population of their towns jump from nothing to several thousand know the profits that accrue during such a process through the increased value of real estate. They recall the recent wonderful examples of Chicago and Kansas City, and all things seem possible to them. They speak of live towns and dead towns, and when one wants to pay a municipality the supreme compliment he says it is "the livest town on the map."

The term dead, however, is a mistaken provincialism. No town is ever really dead uttil it ceases to be a town and becomes a spot where a town once stood.

Start a factory and the town is on its way to the goal expressed by riotous population figures. It is no longer living on the weath its soil alone can produce. Its manufactured articles are going out to other towns, bringing willing tribute from its rivals and from those outside the competitive zone. Smith Center buys its brooms. Metropolitan Podunk, with streetcars and four railroads, smokes its cigars!

Shipments of flour from the local mill sometimes find the ultimate consumer as far away from home as Cuba! Factories build cities. They are so important that certain groups of gentlemen might, within a year, give Chicago a population above that of New York by the simple expedient of moving a sufficient number of factories to the former city.

A few centuries ago the system was different. The most populous towns were those that could offer the best police protection to their inhabitants. Thrifty citizens did not care to live in a town with insecure walls through which ambitious invaders from other towns might penetrate to the embarrassment of the family treasure. They sought a place guarded by husky brawlers, protected by staunch walls and ruled by a warrior of established repute. Having chosen his place of residence, the good citizen provided himself with a stone club, ready alike for the defense of his own or the pillage of another town. This was the first manifestation of city spirit.

By and by poor old erring mankind decided that the looting of cities was not good form and invented the intricate game of business as a more interesting way of transferring the ownership of family treasure. Even under that code the game remained comparatively simple until the building of railways began.

Before that time a sizable town might be built at any point where a boat could unload, and at no other place. With the building of railroads a new element entered, as uncertain and interesting as a loose joker in a poker game. With proper railway connections it was found a town might prosper at any point, and therefore the previous ideas of commercial geography were abandoned.
